Acknowledgements

This paper, serially published in Parts I, II, and III, is a result of research work during my visit in 1957-58 to the United States under the auspices of the Conference Board of the Associated Research Councils. Financial supports were partly afforded by Stanford University from the Shell Funds for Fundamental Research and also through Professor Hubert G. SCHENCK from the ANDERSON Funds, by the University of California, and by Kansas University. Without the aids of these grants this study could not have been accomplished. I am much indebted to the directors or heads of a number of institutions, who have rendered available facilities there. Both officially and personally the professors and many other friends have kindly helped me in various ways. My appreciation to all these persons, with the full names, will be rewritten in Part III.

Particular thanks are due to the Ministry of Education of the Japanese Government and the President of Kyushu University for providing funds necessary for the publication of this Part II and the forthcoming Part III, which would otherwise have been impossible.
