Deng Yannan’s dissertation is an examination on the motivations of the Northeastern military leaders’ decision making which led them to collaborate with the Japanese in 1931-1932, an analysis on the nature of the Manchukuo Military in 1932-1945, including the mutual interactions between Japanese leadership and the various elements of the Manchukuo Military (including Mongol units, the Navy, and social groups), and a study of the aftermath of Manchukuo’s collapse in 1945, the fate of the various units, and their impact on the Chinese Civil War and the People’s Republic of China.

The examination was held on October 13, 2023, from 9:00 AM, in room E-A-103. Professor Linkhoeva participated on Zoom from the United States. Mr. Deng presented his dissertation, focusing on the aspects that the examiners had previously asked him to revise, including a greater focus on a limited number of biographies, clearer discussion of the impact of the Sino-Soviet Conflict of 1929, and clarified and corrected several sections. A lively discussion among Mr. Deng and the examiners followed, and the examiners were impressed with his ability to answer alss questions with clarity and detail.

The examiners found the dissertation to be a significant advance in the study of the Manchukuo regime, ethnic nationalism in China, and mid-20th century collaboration militaries. Through extensive use of multilingual sources from archives scattered over East Asia, it breaks new ground in the study of the pre-history, rational-choice formation, ethnic issues, and post-war fate of the Manchukuo Military, topics which have long been overlooked, despite the fact that former units of the military played a considerable impact in the Chinese Civil War.
